Conventional dental floss is not readily stored and is inconvenient to use. A current disposal mode for unused dental floss is to chuck the floss into a receptacle and tie the receptacle to the belt or waist band of the user. The user then hauls the receptacle around and to trash bins. This disposal method allows the floss to spread out, causing tangling of the floss. Further, the user has no easy way of retrieving a single floss strand. Another current disposal method is to simply discard the receptacle into the garbage bin. However, floss receptacles made of cardboard can be fragile and break easily when they are discarded in the garbage bin. This is true since some small children and small animals can be rather clumsy with a large receptacle discarded in their vicinity. It is an object of the present invention to provide a disposal and storage recept
